It is also a strategic test for the Government of the day, as the Gillard Government has just outlined its first full budget as Prime Minister. The budget is set to a record of spending and tax cuts, with the effect of having to finance significant deficit. But it is the Budget that also outlines the Defence budget – which in turn promises a focus on the 'next frontier'. And it is this – the next frontier – that I want to discuss in a little bit of detail. Like most of you, I am seeing many change in the world. And I want to try and interpret them. In doing so, I want to focus on some crucial questions: What are we facing in the world? What is it that we need to prepare for? And what are we telling our young people? I'll go through each of these in more detail, but for now let's start with the first question – what are we facing in the world? I want to take a few things out of context. A few days ago, I went through the Conservative Party's Annual Conference in Birmingham. The theme was 'The Way Forward'. And one of the things I discussed with the Tories was their focus on defence – which is a very good thing. As we saw, the UK Government announced that it will be stepping up defence spending to meet emerging threats in its Strategic Defence and Security Review. But what was more interesting is the very statement from the Prime Minister which preceded the announcement of the strategy. "We are seeing the rise of small states with limited resources. But some of the most dangerous rogue states have the money and the technologies that state-based powers no longer have. "This is a global problem, and the way to deal with it is by working together in a multi-lateral way." And what is interesting is that this comment was then followed by the following comments: "We will continue to look to forge a new and stronger partnership with the United States. We are looking at ways that we
